The oldest recorded account of Bigfoot dates all the way back to 986 AD by famous Viking explorer Leif Ericson and his men. Upon their first landing in the New World the Norsemen wrote about manlike beasts that towered over the Vikings. These beasts were distinctly different than the natives they encountered. They wrote that these beasts were "horribly ugly, hairy, swarthy, and with great black eyes." The Vikings called these ape-like bipedal beasts Skellring. The Skellring lived in the woods, had a foul smelling odor, and a deafening shriek. Leif had many encounters with the Skellring before departing from the island. Bryan Sykes, a professor of human genetics at Oxford University who recently embarked on a project to DNA test any or all available evidence for the existence of Bigfoot, said belief in Bigfoot-like beasts is a very consistent feature across cultures — "so much so that I have found indigenous people not even bothering to question their existence as they are so much a part of everyday life." The following book is the accumulation of years of research following my encounter. At the time I was looking for others who had experiences similar to mine. It was the only form of therapy I could find that eased my anxiety. I refused to go to the town's only therapist. In a small town like this everyone would have known and it would have served as cause for a black mark on my family. After years of researching Bigfoot, the Yeti, and Sasquatch I have collected hundreds of accounts. Some I believe to be true and some I believe to be false claims of people looking for their names in print or their face on a TV screen. This book is the accounts I believe are most certainly true.
