Serious illness can be devastating. Imagine what it takes to overcome it - to overcome the devastation to the body, to be robbed of one's identity, confidence or independence, to face death, to persevere through the horrors required to hold it at bay and, finally, to rebuild a life that will never be the same. Now imagine having to do it over and over and over again.

That is exactly what Dr. Marie Kirchner Stone had to do, and she shares her experiences in her striking new memoir, "Battling Death: A Different Life." Diagnosed at age twenty with Hodgkin's Disease, Dr. Stone did not know as she entered treatment that her health would never return to her. Throughout the following forty years, she faced the Hodgkin's Disease, breast cancer, thyroid cancer, cervical cancer, endometriosis, open-heart surgery, a debilitating stroke and skin cancer; some were the result of her radiation treatments for the Hodgkin's, others were not. Yet her tale is not a simple litany of diseases and treatments, but rather an inspiring and motivational triumph of the spirit over adversity, as she never once let the diseases that riddled her keep her from living a full and productive life. Dedicated to teaching, she was repeatedly forced to start anew, yet she never let go of her determination to teach and help the children realize the best in themselves. To Dr. Stone, "[t]eaching promoted a symbiotic, constructive, and mutually beneficial mind-body outcome both for the students and me."

A shining example of what it means never to quit, Dr. Stone's extraordinary tale shows that while "Battling Death" may indeed lead to a different kind of life, it can be a life well lived.
