Nineteenth-Century Scientific Instruments and Their Makers

In the nineteenth century the need for scientific and precision instruments in research, education and a variety of professions rose to an unprecedented level. Requirements ranged from virtually unique research apparatus to a vast range of standard equipment for laboratory or classroom use. This book concentrates on the instrument makers who met this growing demand, and who in order to do so successfully had to combine scientific, technical and commercial abilities in one person. Themes discussed include the relationship between instrument makers and scientists and developments in the organization of the instrument-making industry.
