Michael Steven's already troubled young life has taken a sudden, dramatic turn. Severely injured, he does not know if he'll survive the night.

Reflecting on the evening's dreadful events, wondering if he could have done anything to alter them, his thoughts drift. Soon, he is contemplating his remarkable life, his dysfunctional family, and the possibility he might have to answer for his life to God.

While vividly recalling the most amusing, distressing, bizarre, and disturbing events of his young life, he begins to see his life differently. He comes to understand that "the monster you know is far easier to deal with than the monster you don't."

Will he make it through the night? And if he does, will he find peace? In what form will it come?
