Business Organizations: A Transactional Perspective

Business Organizations: A Transactional Perspective

"Business Organizations: A Transactional Perspective teaches business organizations from a transactional practice perspective rather than a litigation-based one. By using this book, students will gain a solid foundation in the law of business organizations. Additionally, students will enhance their understanding of the business contexts in which the law operates, and they will gain an appreciation of the practice issues confronted by transactional lawyers when advising business organizations.

The book incorporates both narrative text to explain core concepts of law and practice and actual statutory provisions, thus eliminating the need for a statutory supplement. Specific topics include forming, operating and terminating partnerships, corporations and limited liability companies. Additionally, the book presents basic accounting and tax issues any transactional lawyer should know.

Serving as both instructional textbook and preparation for the bar exam, Business Organizations: A Transactional Perspective can be used not only in law school courses, but in any graduate or undergraduate legal course on business organizations and associations, corporations, partnerships and limited liability companies.

Donald Scotten is an adjunct assistant professor of law at the University of Southern California's Gould School of Law. He teaches courses on business organizations, mergers and acquisitions, and the United States legal system. Before joining USC, Professor Scotten held the position of first vice-president and senior counsel for Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., and was a senior associate at Howrey LLP. He earned his J.D., Order of the Coif, at the College of William and Mary Law School and is currently pursuing an executive LL.M in taxation. "
